GIVING AND GETTING

The Christmas shopping season is at its height, and the stores are thronged with people with hungry countenances and aching limbs seeking, searching. For what? Not for something they want for themselves, but for something they want for others. Whatever may be said against the extravagances and abuse of Christmas, and on that line much may be said with justice, the fact remains that it is the one period of the year when the nation, nay, when the whole Christian world, turns for a moment from the inward contemplation of self to the outer consideration of selves, from absorption in getting to absorption in giving. It is a time when the heart, no matter how hard, is softened; when the purse, no matter how tightly locked, is loosened a bit; when the horizon of humanity is broadened, and when love, surpassed into silence and inactivity through many months, furnishes visible evidence that it has not perished from the earth. We little realize how much this means to us individually, how much it means to mankind, how much it means to civilization. Setting aside the re to the maintenance of the equilibrium season has values that are not to be measured in money or in trade, spiritual values that annually contribute to the maintenance of the equilibrium of the souls of men, and to the betterment of human life. It operates very generally to save man from himself to prevent the hardening of the shell which encases him; and the force of the custom makes its influence felt among those who need it most, those in whom the desiccation of the heart is most serious, and who would respond to no other power.—Globe-Democrat.
